A new celebrity kinship has blossomed.

Though she sweetly protests that Gisele Bündchen is "wealthier" and "much more famous" than she is, and "never has days where she looks as crappy," Mayim Bialik is flattered to be compared to her.

And not just because of the whole supermodel thing.

"I respect Gisele tremendously for her courageous statements about global health and breastfeeding (the evolutionary and natural way to feed and nourish human babies)," Bialik, an advocate of au naturel kid rearing, wrote yesterday on the Holistic Moms Network.

"However, I don't think I should be grouped with her," she protested. "First of all, she is much wealthier than I am, I promise, so she may get help with her 'perfect' parenting that I do not have the luxury of."

And, aside from the supernatural-hotness thing, "the fact that I believe in every woman's right to an empowering natural birth, encourage and practice extended nursing on demand with no social life in sight for the next few years, choose to make baby shampoo and granola and live a holistic lifestyle, and serve as my children's primary caregiver does not make me an example of someone wanting to be 'perfect.' It just makes me me."

And what prompted this stream of commentary from the Big Bang Theory star?

Bialik was responding to a post from a fellow mom on a website for parents trying to get their kids into private elementary schools that singled out the actress and Gisele for things they've said about motherhood under the heading, "Perfect Mommy Syndrome: Are Celebrity Moms Too Perfect?"
